Watertown Plan of Conservation and Development

3.0 EXISTING LAND USE AND ZONING

The built environment (the type, location and intensity of existing and future land uses) defines the character of a town. The town's Zoning Code, subdivision regulations, and wetland regulation are the major tools with which the town regulates land use and influences development patterns and practices. This chapter summarizes the existing pattern of land use in Watertown.

3.1 Land Use

Watertown contains 29.6 square miles (18,960 acres) of land, including 0.4 square miles of water, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. The town is for the most part a residential suburban community within the larger Waterbury metropolitan area, but with a solid industrial base. As of 2004, there were 8,401 housing units. Population density is roughly 754 people per square mile, or 1.17 persons per acre.

There are fourteen land use categories in Watertown: five residential, four businesses, one industrial, two public and semi-public, one general wetland, and one open space. The designated land use categories and boundaries are generally comparable to existing zoning categories (zoning districts discussed in Section 3.2). In 1997, the Connecticut Department of Environmental Protection (CDEP) completed a land-use survey of Watertown using its own seven general land use categories. Below is a summary of CDEP's 1997 land-use estimates.

Land Use (acres):

Total	Urban	Agriculture	Forest	Barren	Water	Wetland	Other
18,960	2,818	5,954	9,580	128	428	36	16

Current land-use patterns in the community are fairly well established and reflect a pattern of relatively compact development around the town center, surrounded by low-density residential, rural areas, industrial areas, forests and watershed areas (See Figure 3-1). Low density residential developments outside the town center are generally located along Litchfield Road, Guernseytown Road and Northfield Road. There is no development along the entire eastern portion of town, which is occupied by the Mattatuck State Forest, or the northern section of town occupied by Black Rock State Park. The northeast section is sparsely populated because much of the area is designated part of the Waterbury Watershed.

Existing land uses generally conform to the 2005-2010 State Plan of Conservation and Development's Locational Guide Map, as shown in Figure 1-2, as well as the plan's six growth management principles, as discussed on page 4.
