DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Frog Hollow takes its name from the marshy conditions once caused by the Park River, which forms the northern boundary of the district. The main railroad line beside the river provided the backbone for late nineteenth-century factory development, and along with the factories came houses, schools, churches and stores, all built on what had been undeveloped farmland. This classic working-class neighborhood of thirty-five square blocks, southwest of downtown, exists at present much as it did at the turn of the century.

Clearly-defined features form the northern and western boundaries. At the north is the Park River (now diverted underground), lined on its southern edge with the factories which employed many local residents, and on the west is the open space of Pope Park. To the east, Lafayette Street separates the district from the larger-scale development of Washington Street. On the south, Madison Street defines the traditional limit of the working-class neighborhood.

The two main arteries of the district, both running east-west, are Capitol Avenue to the north, on which fronted the factories, and Park Street on the south, which was and is the shopping center for the district. Between these two streets and extending three blocks south of Park Street is a dense working class neighborhood made up primarily of multiple family dwellings with the churches, schools, clubs, and stores that serviced the community. The area was entirely developed after 1850 with a peak of activity coming in the years 1890-1910.

The district is densely built up with little vacant land. The buildings generally have the same mass<sup>and</sup> scale. They are<sup>three</sup> sometimes four stories high, whether they were built for housing, stores, or factories. On residential blocks the lots are usually about 40 by 140 feet in size with houses set 20 feet from the walk and about the same distance from one another. It is an urban scene with unity of mass and scale which gives a remarkable sense of place.

Since 1910 there has been no major redevelopment; urban renewal has passed the area by. Consequently, there are relatively few intrusions in the area. Along Broad Street are a number of poor-quality twentieth century apartment blocks; and there are other recent buildings of insensitive design, particularly along Park Street. A noticeable amount of physical deterioration has occurred, again particularly along Broad and Park Streets, as the economic fortune of the neighborhood declined with the closings of the factories. Neighborhood associations are now mounting a strong effort to reverse the decay.

As the area began to develop in mid-nineteenth century the first group of houses was built in the Greek Revival style on the south side of Grand street between Oak and Hungerford Streets. Here are five wooden houses, gable fronts towards the street forming pediments, built near a single brick farmhouse which may be the oldest building in the district. The Greek Revival structures have simple classical doorways with transoms and side lights which occupy one of the three bays of the front facades. Probably all identical at the time they were built, they have undergone varying degrees of alteration and modernization some with the addition of inappropriate siding.

Next in the time sequence came individual homes of brick in the Italianate style with brownstone lintels and sills, wide, overhanging roofs supported by consoles, and porches with Greek columns. A trend toward multiple-unit housing became evident with the construction of the double Italianates along Affleck Street between Park and Ward Streets, and multiple-family housing came to dominate the area. Occasional individual houses in wood were built toward the end of the century with the turrets and bays, shaped shingles and colored glass windows of the Queen Anne style, for example along Oak Street and on Russ between Babcock and Putnam Streets.

The real building boom occurred toward the end of the century, when blocks of houses and apartments, schools, factories and churches were constructed. The universal use during these years of a single building material-red brick-gives cohesiveness to the district. Similar techniques were used in buildings of different types. For example, the tower of the Billings and Spencer office building on Russ Street has round-headed windows and brownstone string courses setting off its brickwork, just as does the tower of its neighbor, the Danish Evangelical Lutheran Church at the corner of Broad Street.

The single structure which typifies Frog Hollow more than any other is the "perfect six." The perfect six is a multiple family dwelling, oblong in shape and three stories high, with two families living on each floor. Customarily, the entranceway leading to the two ground floor apartments and to the stairs for the upper floors is recessed in the center of the facade, often under a round arched opening. On either side of the entrance are often bold three-story bowfronts leading up to heavy applied molded cornices supported by consoles. Perfect sixes were often built two or three at a time, sometimes in rows of six or eight, and are to be found along Zion, York, Jefferson, Madison, Putnam, and Ward Streets, Park Terrace and Putnam Heights.

A popular variation on the perfect six was a version designed to house three families. Here the entrance is at one side, with a single bow on the facade, or perhaps a tier of three porches. The building in effect is half a perfect six and is familiarly known as a "three-decker." A row of eighteen of these three-deckers is located on the west side of Babcock Street between Russ and Park Streets.

Almost without exception the perfect sixes and three deckers throughout the district are lived in and are in good condition, sustaining a viability and level of maintenance above that of other types of housing in the district. This happy circumstance can perhaps be explained by the fact that the structures are sturdily built, commodious, and economical to operate and maintain.

Entirely different in concept, scale, style and originality are three rows of attached houses off Capitol Avenue along Columbia Street and Park Terrace, designed by Hartford architect George Keller. The first row of 12 single family units was put up on the west side of Columbia Street in 1888. Well received, it was followed by the row across the street in 1899 and by that on Park Terrace in 1895. These are modest homes but done professionally and designed cohesively in brick with large expanses of shingled roofs, wooden porches, and shed dormers. The row on the west side of Columbia Street is anchored at each end by a large round tower with conical roof straight from a medieval keep, while the roof line of the Park Terrace row consists of an arrangement of central paired towers flanked by dormers running out to end pavilions.

The two main arteries servicing the area, Capitol Avenue and Park Street, grew up as the area developed. The factory buildings started at the south-west corner and gradually stretched east to Broad Street between Capitol Avenue and the river-side railroad. Built and re-built as growth and changing conditions demanded, the factories now present a steady four story facade along the north side of Capitol Avenue and have now largely been remodelled into office space.

An additional important factory site is one block to the south in the block bounded by Broad, Russ, and Lawrence Streets. Here the Billings and Spencer Co. built its drop forging plant (later known as Arrow, Hart) with most of the construction coming in the 1890's. Its two and three story brick buildings, with office tower at the corner of Russ and Lawrence streets, are unchanged in appearance from the time they were built and thus present an unusual example of industrial buildings from three-quarters of a century ago. Presently vacant and for sale, the buildings are under study for possible rehabilitation into housing.

Park Street is far more lively. Its original single and two-family dwellings now have added store fronts for retail shops. Some three and four story commercial buildings were built along the street at the turn of the century, with the ground floors used for stores and the upper floors for offices and apartments. Several of these buildings are now in poor repair. A theater was built (now closed) as well as some twentieth century commercial buildings, of nondescript nature except for an Art Deco variety store. Two churches, Immaculate Conception and St. Anne's were constructed during the building boom and continue to serve large congregations. On the whole the street is given over to shops, boutiques, cafes, bars, banks and general commercial activity of a neighborhood type.

Neighborhood development brought the need for schools and churches. In addition to the two churches mentioned above, one was built on Broad Street south of Park Street, and four were constructed along Russ Street at various corners. All save one were constructed in red brick. The Danish Evangelical Lutheran Church at the northeast corner of Russ and Broad Streets is typical. Built in 1891, its tower, already mentioned above for its similarity to the Billings and Spencer tower, has a tall, pyramidal spire over flared eaves with a gold cross finial. The church is cruciform in shape on high brownstone foundations under a roof of slate shingles. The fenestration is an interesting combination of a rose window on the west, a rose half window on the south, and round headed windows grouped under large blind arches. A drip stone over the entrance, like that over the office factory door, and splayed brick lintels complete the anonymous execution of this well designed church.

The neighborhood got its own public school in 1878 when the first section of the Lawrence Street School was constructed, fronting on Lawrence Street. It is a 54 by 92 foot, two-story, red brick structure of eight rooms in the Palladian mode with a central pedimented pavilion flanked by pilastered walls, with the windows set in recessed panels and capped by incised brownstone lintels. The architect is unknown. The next, middle section of the school, put up in 1895 to the designs of Hapgood and Hapgood of Hartford is Renaissance Revival in spirit under a broad overhanging roof, the whole dominated by multiple tall chimney stacks. The third and final section, fronting on Babcock Street, completed the school in 1905. It exhibits the round headed windows of the Romanesque Revival. In this one building is an array of three architectural styles important during the final quarter of the century. A new Lawrence School was built in the 1930's at the corner of Putnam and Sigourney Streets which is now called the Burns School. The original school was sold to St. Anne's Church which continues to operate it as a school.

Across Putnam Street from St. Anne's Church is St. Anne's rectory, formerly the dormitory for the Watkinson Juvenile Asylum and Farm School for neglected and abandoned boys. This 1884 work of George Keller brought to Hartford at an early date sophistication and simplicity of the prominent English architects Phillip Webb and Norman Shaw in an H shaped plan of balanced asymmetry using the gabled roof over a brick first story, with shingles above. The Watkinson School's land abutted that of the Hartford Orphan Asylum, now occupied by Burns School. Both of these institutions moved to the western edge of Hartford at the turn of the century.

The neighborhood mix of factories, homes, stores, churches and schools is made up of individually modest resources which together constitute a classic turn-of-the-century working class neighborhood. Despite some intrusions and some decay the working class character of the neighborhood is remarkably well maintained at the present.

In sum, of approximately 904 buildings, only about three per cent are incompatible intrusions, almost all of them recent commercial buildings along Park Street. The earliest structures date from the Greek Revival period; about 24 houses were built around 1850 in the eastern side of the district off Park Street at Grand, Hungerford, Ward and Wolcott Streets. Filling in the blocks just south of Park and west to Affleck Street are some 53 simple Italianate structures from the years 1850 to 1869. In the next eleven years about 98 houses, mostly multiple-family, were built in the blocks to the west, north and south. The real building boom started about 1880, with some 290 buildings in 16 years; characteristic brick dwellings with wood trim filled in the southern and northern areas of the district. By 1909, about 247 perfect sixes and three-deckers brought development up to the edge of Pope Park. The most southern blocks and the rest of the undeveloped land were filled in with approximately 180 buildings between 1909 and 1929. Only about 40 buildings date from after 1930.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Frog Hollow is significant because it provides an unimpaired demonstration of the development of a nineteenth century, factory-based, urban neighborhood. The district is a rare remaining example of how simultaneous growth of industrial and residential facilities complemented each other as the process of urbanization progressed. While the great majority of individual buildings are not architecturally distinguished, they do provide excellent, well preserved examples of their types, and Hartford's best architects of the era are represented by several buildings in the district. In addition, technical developments in machine tool manufacture gave the area's factories an important place in the industry of the period.

The initial invasion of the farm land that was Frog Hollow was accomplished by the Sharps Rifle Co. soon after mid-century. The factory was built at the western border of the district on the Park River. The road leading from town to the factory was called Rifle Lane; the name was later changed to College Street and then Capitol Avenue. A century earlier, mills had located along the Park River because of the water power, but by the 1850's water power no longer was used and the presence of the main railroad line along the river was the prime attraction.

Weed Sewing Machine Co. started up in space leased from Sharps, and in the 1870's, when Sharps was sold to P.T. Barnum and the operation moved to Bridgeport, Weed bought the Sharps buildings. Later Weed manufactured the Columbia bicycles for the Col. A.A. Pope who soon took over the company and re-named it Pope Manufacturing Co. In time this enterprise failed and the buildings were sold after the turn of the century to a new but prospering firm already located along the Park River by the name of Pratt and Whitney. In 1872 Billings and Spencer started their drop forging plant a block away, from which enterprise Spencer soon withdrew to form Hartford Machine Screw Co. on Capitol Avenue.

Billings, Spencer, Pratt and Whitney all gained their early industrial training while working for Col. Samuel Colt in his Hartford Armory. Colt's great success was in part to the early introduction of rational production methods and utilization of the latest in efficient machinery. The experience gained at Colt's by these four men was a strong boost to the industrial development and prosperity of Frog Hollow.

The technology fostered by Colt was refined and developed along Capitol Avenue. Billings in his plant brought drop forging to an advanced state of precision which broadened the application of this technique into the area of dies and tools. Spencer carried forward the development of machine tools with his Hartford Machine Screw Co., and Hartford became a machine tool center of international importance with the growth of Pratt and Whitney. The contract which put Pratt and Whitney on their feet in Frog Hollow came in 1872-1874 from the government of Germany for production of machines for several German armories to manufacture a modern rifle which was used effectively in the Franco-Prussian War. Today Pratt and Whitney Aircraft continues as a major supplier to the American military in the manufacture of jet engines and associated equipment.

The present buildings date from the early 20th century but derive from their famous forebears. On the north side of Capitol Avenue running west from Broad Street to Capitol Avenue a building now used for State offices was built by Hart and Hegeman, who also took over the nearby Billings and Spencer factory. The multi-purpose building from Lawrence to opposite Babcock was initially a unit in the Pratt and Whitney complex. The new office building of the Aetna Insurance Co. from Babcock almost to Putnam Street replaces Pope Manufacturing Co. facilities, and the complex further west running to opposite Columbia St. incorporates structures used originally in part by Pope Manufacturing Co. and in part by Hartford Machine Screw Co.

All of this industrial activity along Capitol Avenue was matched by neighborhood development in the blocks to the south. Streets were laid out and houses constructed by a variety of individual builders who bought farm land, often from the heirs of the old families. The Babcock farm provided the land for Babcock Street, and the Russ and Hungerford estates sold building lots on streets which carry these names.

In the case of George Mortson (1856-1919), however, the man for whom a street was named was active in its development. Mortson's area was the acreage made available when the Watkinson School moved to the edge of the city. "A large part of Putnam Heights was developed and built up by Mr. Mortson," according to his obituary in the Hartford Courant. Putnam Heights parallels Mortson Street; both streets are one block long and lined with perfect sixes built from 1906 to 1910. At the time of his death Mortson's estate was inventoried at $56,917, almost all in the form of more than a dozen second mortgages on residential properties. It seems appropriate that the developer of working class homes should himself be a man of modest means with his assets invested almost exclusively in the brick and mortar he knew so well.

The Columbia Street and Park Terrace row houses which the Weed Sewing Machine Company built across from their factory are another matter. This is the only corporate housing development in Frog Hollow. Alternate theories have been advanced to explain Weed's motivation. One theory has it that Weed provided housing near the plant as an attraction to help draw workers. Another view holds that as Weed already owned the land and since the sewing machine business was slow, the housing venture was simply an effort to develop some needed income. Whatever the motivation, the Weed Sewing Machine Company employed George Keller (1842-1935) at the height of his creativity and he produced three outstanding rows of houses. Although Weed soon sold them, the rows remained under collective ownership until well into the twentieth century.

The neighborhood churches, in addition to being worthy examples of the local bricklayers' art, demonstrate by their names the ethnic diversity of the people who lived nearby. The Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Emmanuel and Our Savior's Danish Evangelical Lutheran Churches on Russ Street proclaim the origin of their communicants. On Park Street St. Anne's Church continues to conduct its services and its school in French. Nearby are located the Lithuanian-American Citizens Club and the Polish-American Club. In recent years Portugese and Spanish speaking people have become important in the neighborhood.

All these ethnic cross currents are the expression in Hartford of the national policy encouraging immigration. As wave after wave of immigrants came to the city they sought factory jobs and settled in Frog Hollow, moving on in some cases to other parts of the city or suburbs only to be followed by others. Frog Hollow thus encapsulates an important phase of the social history of the era.

The Lawrence Street School, now St. Anne's, is a rare three-step demonstration of contemporary architectural styles. St. Anne's also has preserved the Watkinson School in an excellent state of repair. This school building, in addition to its importance architecturally as an early example of its style, is interesting as an artifact in the history of nineteenth century charities. David Watkinson (1778-1857), the donor by testament of the school, was an immigrant who became a highly successful merchant and entrepreneur. He felt it incumbent upon himself to provide for community benevolences. He did so with the Watkinson Library and the Watkinson School, both of which actively survive today. In the twentieth century such individual efforts have been largely supplanted by foundation and government grants. In Watkinson's Frog Hollow building we have a reminder of an earlier approach to community services.

Frog Hollow in the 1890's was a beehive of activity. Industry was strong and growing. New housing was springing up on block after block of former farm land. Seven churches were built. The neighborhood school was expanded. The results of all this activity are in place today with few intrusions or additions. The area therefore presents a rare example of a classic turn-of-the-century working class neighborhood. The district preserves a sense place and a neighborhood feeling which provide unique insight into conditions of the era.

Addendum

Re: 11-15 Squire Street

The building at 11-15 Squire Street is within the area of the district as delineated by the boundary drawn on the district map, but this property inadvertently was omitted from the inventory. It should be listed as a contributing structure.

Built in 1914, 11-15 Squire Street is a three-story six-family brick apartment house in the Neo-Classical Revival style. Its length runs parallel with the street in contrast to the position at right angles to the street of the typical Frog Hollow six-family apartment house known as a Perfect Six.

Granite foundations and water table support the structure. Its small flat-roofed central porch protects a doorway flanked by side lights. On either side of the doorway are two single windows and a pair of windows, each group comprising the fenestration for an apartment. Windows are 1-over-1, with cast concrete lintels and sills. There is a prominent classical cornice supported by a modillion course at the roof line; it probably is made of sheet metal.

The building provided housing for workers in the Frog Hollow factories. It is an integral and supporting component of this industrially related historic district.

AMENDMENT

The theme of the Frog Hollow Historic District is the active industrial development of Hartford during the fourth quarter of the 19th century and the early 20th century, which was concentrated in the Frog Hollow neighborhood. The inventory lists the factories and related housing, churches, schools, and commercial buildings.

There is an inconsistency in the nomination between the Period of Significance and the inventory. The Period of Significance is stated to extend to 1910, but in the inventory some 135 buildings constructed between 1910 and 1930 are said to contribute to the historic and architectural significance of the district.

Since the industrial development of the district continued on a declining basis up to the advent of the Great Depression, the designation of buildings constructed up to that time as contributing is logical and consistent with the theme of the nomination.

Accordingly, by this amendment the Period of Significance is extended to 1930.

Technical Amendment

Section number _____ Page _____

This technical amendment revises the period of significance of the Frog Hollow Historic District and its accompanying Frog Hollow Boundary Increase documentation. Accordingly, the period of significance is extended from 1910 to 1929, the beginning of the Great Depression.

The Frog Hollow section of Hartford experienced strong industrial growth in the late 19th and early 20 centuries, as part of the industrial revolution. Important factories for the production of rifles (Sharp's), machine tools (Pratt & Whitney), drop forgings (Billings & Spencer), job-specific machine manufacturing (Hartford Machine Screw), and other products of mechanical ingenuity were built and operated in Frog Hollow. Community support buildings, including, churches, housing, a commercial strip, brewery, and theater, followed the factories to provide essentials required for people living in the basically industrial environment.

The greatest period of growth came, roughly, between the times of the Civil War and World War I, in terms of new factories and new community support buildings. Thereafter, the growth rate slackened but did not stop, witness the construction of large working-class apartment houses at 929-943 Park Street and 316-326 Park Terrace in the early 1920s. The later buildings enriched the architectural heritage of the district, adding, in the case of the two cited buildings, Georgian Revival and Neo-Classical Revival designs to the earlier Victorian-era works, while continuing the materials, mass, setting, and purpose of the earlier buildings. Red brick continued to be the dominant building material, used for apartment houses, theaters, churches, and factories of size and mass sympathetic to one another in an urban setting.

After 1929, Frog Hollow ceased to grow and in due course deterioration set in.
